

This essay, destined for a monograph journal issue on cultural studies and postcolonialism, is an inquiry into the way visual arts intervene to disclose and unsettle perspectives on the inequalities within the metropolitan venues in which immigrant populations perform for economic gain. Mapping the historical context of the hegemonic structures that such interventions seek to